During the thirteen years, which I spent in the East, I enjoyed vast opportunities to collect works of a literature, which is rapidly falling into decay and whose most precious monuments have for the most part already disappeared. Three years I resided at Dilly, the capital of the Mogols at the head of one of the best Madressahs of the Moslim world, two years I was employed by the government to catalogue the libraries of Lucknow — now the principal seat of oriental lore in India — and I had an opportunity to examine ten thousand Arabic, Persian and Hindústány manuscripts; and two years I travelled in Egypt, Syria, Mesopotamia, the 'Irág, the island of Kishm and Masqat. I made conscientiously use of the opportunities thus afforded to me : I visited every library, public or private, to which I could obtain access, I examined every book I could lay hold of, I spared no expense to secure a good manuscript, and if I met with a rare work, which I could not obtain by purchase I had it copied and carefully compared, and I had agents in various parts of the country, through whom I obtained books even from Mecca and Madynah. Only a fortnight ago I received a list of 531 Arabic manuscripts, which are for sale at Basrah on the banks of the Tigris.

In making these exertions and spending so much money, to collect manuscripts of the literature of the Islám,

I was not guided by a childish bibliomania, but by a sense of duty. I admit that the literature of the East has very little intrinsic value, and I repeat here what I have said elsewhere on this subject : „it contains few facts, if any, in astronomy, medicine, mathematics, natural history, or any other science, which are new to us. Even in poetry and philosophy, oriental works contain few sentiments or ideas which we can admire or would like to adopt. Nevertheless it deserves to be cultivated.“

„A century or two ago people thought if they could only understand the language of birds : these disinterested bipeds would reveal to them where treasures are hidden, they would teach them the mysteries of nature, and enlighten them on the most important questions connected with our existence. In like manner some persons thought that in those venerably looking old oriental manuscripts every science under the sun was locked up. Naturalists and orientalisists have dug up their respective vineyards. Treasures they found none, but both parties have rendered the soil fertile. Naturalists, though they have learned no mysteries from the speeches of birds, have founded a noble science by dissecting their bodies, studying and comparing their physiology, observing their habits, and following up their geographical distribution. Man is a nobler object of study than birds, and the philosophy of history is a higher pursuit than the philosophy of nature. The acquaintance with the literature of the east shows us man reflected in his own creation under peculiar circumstances and through a longer period than the literature of Europe. The student is carried beyond the narrow limits of European prejudices and associations and enabled to enlarge them. Taking a historical view of oriental pursuits, they are of the highest philosophical importance.“

Oriental nations are no longer able to take care of their own literary treasures. This is not owing to a want of veneration for them but to apathy and imbecility. If you describe to them the telegraph or a steamer, they may be heard saying : „ We observed since many years that the Franks لعنهم الله purchase every old book they can find, and these are the fruits of their study of our literature. But الله اكبر عليهم (Anglice) God will d—n them all the same“. I once sent my servant at Damascus to return a book which had been lent to me. He was a Christian of mount Libanon and as he passed through the bázár, two zealous champions of the Islám assailed him and administered to him a sound thrashing for profaning the sacred volume (it was a history) by his touch. Yet they allow their books to rot, to be devoured by insects and destroyed by neglect, though a Moslim never wilfully tears up a book. Even the best informed among the men of the old school take a very erroneous view of their own literature : they only value the latest and vilest productions of scholastic learning. As a general rule they place no value on old books and generally on works containing facts, and take little pains to preserve them, their destruction therefore proceeds with great rapidity. In some oriental towns you find bags and bags of odd leaves of the most valuable volumes, which if complete would give occupation to a learned society of Europe for a quarter of a century. Under these circumstances the duty of taking care of the patrimony of our eastern brethern devolves upon the enlightened public of Europe, and every man who finds an opportunity ought to secure as many good books as he can.

I doubt whether ever one individual has brought to Europe so many oriental works as are contained in my collection. It is however not so much its extent, as its completeness what renders it valuable. Whilst in some important departments as the Biography of Moḥammad, Oçúl alḥadyth, Geography, Çúfism, etc., it is as rich or richer than the best libraries of Europe or Asia; there is no branch of learning which has ever been cultivated by the Moslims, of which it does not contain the leading works of reference. I made it a point to have at hand ample materials of information on every subject. I am aware that a notion prevails in Europe that only the history of the Musulmans is worth while studying. But to claim an acquaintance with the history of a nation, without having mastered its literature — to pretend for instance to be acquainted with ancient Greece without having perused Homer and Plato — is so supremely ridiculous that it would be waste of time to attempt to refute such an error.

A complete knowledge of the habits, life and literature of Asia appears to me to be at the present juncture a most important desideratum for Europe; not only will it complete the philosophy of history which ought to be founded exclusively on facts, but it will smoothen the path to that connexion between the East and West, which is inevitable and is proceeding in much more rapid strides than it is usually supposed.

As it is uncertain whether I shall return to India after the expiration of my furlough, my collection may be considered as closed and the time has come for printing a catalogue thereof, for literary treasures are in a certain sense public property. I have therefore prepared this list before the books were packed for transmission round the Cape of Good Hope to Hamburgh, where they may be expected to arrive in March next. To diminish the expence of printing the list is somewhat meagre and it has been compiled with considerable hurry, yet it will be found that it contains a good deal of bibliographical information. In addition to Manuscripts it also contains those books which have been issued from Musulman presses, because in Europe they are nearly as rare as Mss. and I have therefore taken great pains to make as complete a collection of Indian prints referring to Mohámmadan literature as I could. But I do not include in this list translations made from European languages, missionary tracts, and oriental works published by Europeans, though in this respect my collection is very complete and contains many rare and also many expensive books.

The arrangement of the list is very simple. After the number, the language is indicated in which the book is written : a. means Arabic, p. Persian, h. Hindústány and t. Turkish or Chighatáy. After the title of the book it is stated whether it is in manuscript or lithographed or printed in types by m. l. t. respectively. C. means Calcutta, and L. means Lucknow.

lack of bibliographical information in relation to Mann script also contains those books which have been listed foot-Mannian pieces because in Europe they are really as can be seen that I have the time when your pains to make a complete collection of Latin pieces relating to Mannian literature as I could. But I do not include in this list translations made from European languages into German and several works published by Europeans though in the text they call themselves complete and contain many rare and important passages.
 The arrangement of the list is as follows. After the number the language is indicated in which the book is written and the name of the author is given in the original and a Latin or English title. After the title of the book is stated whether it is a manuscript or printed or printed in parts and in what country. The names of the means of access are given at the end of the list.
